Please help me solve the problem. A: The OpenSSL library in v2.0.x (the version that is installed in Windows) is incompatible with Windows 8 and lower. As Microsoft is no longer supporting Windows 8 and below, there is no other option than installing a newer version of OpenSSL. You could (if you're Windows user) install OpenSSL 0.9.8y. From the OpenSSL website: OpenSSL 0.9.8y can successfully build OpenSSL in Windows for all supported Windows versions (since Windows 2000 - back to 95). However the build is unable to build all binaries and it is also unable to set all options. For details on which binaries are missing and which options are not set, see below. To install OpenSSL 0.9.8y on Windows you can download OpenSSL 1.0.2g from the OpenSSL website (in ZIP file), unzip it in any directory, and just run the setup.exe (not looking to be specific) in this unzipped directory, as you would do for any other Windows program. Note: If you don't have space for a new installation of OpenSSL 1.0.2g, you can install OpenSSL 0.9.8y as a minor update (aka update). Don't use any "recommended version number" for the update, just use 0.9.8y. The OpenSSL website also states: "Maintainer note: The Windows build of this version comes as an OpenSSL Update. The original version was originally prepared for VMS UNIX, but the VMS version is not needed and cannot be built from the current sources. This build was prepared to allow people to build OpenSSL on Windows without having to use external VMS sources" It seems you're using v2.0.x, which is a completely incompatible version of OpenSSL, therefore installing OpenSSL v0.9.8y is the best alternative. You might be tempted to use one of the alternatives offered in this answer: a portable OpenSSL, as any of the three available in the answer are compiled to target all currently supported Windows OS's. However: The first alternative and the way it is compiled is using a manually compiled, specific version of OpenSSL. This means that the binary you get is not portable among different Windows versions, and is not compatible with Windows 8 and
